State Services

Within the memory of middle-aged citizens the accepted duty of Governments was "to keep the peace," inside which individuals were free to fight their own battles, to prosper, or to struggle against adversity. The dispensation of the toughest survival, while private charity or the workhouse were the only safeguards of the weak, and of the victims of misfortune, against institution and final disaster.

Persuaded that there was no safe or practical alternative to the economic doctrines of Adam

Smith and John Stuart Mill, British Governments persisted in the belief that any serious departure from the mercenary principle of the "Manchester School" would strike at the roots of personal liberty and commercial stability. About forty years ago, with the provision of old-age pensions, came the first serious cracks in that icy wall of indifference to the welfare of the sufferings of the millions who had struggled in vain against the manifold vicissitudes of an industrial civilisation. Hard on the heels of old-age pensions followed schemes of national health and unemployment insurance; extensions of factory and workmen's compensation legislation; tax and rate levies for the clearance of slum areas, and the provision of dwellings for needy workers; radical changes in the dispensation of poor law relief; marked developments in public health services, and a long series of other departures from the days and doctrines of laissez-faire economy. Side by side with all these advances in social organisation came the play of the part in mitigating the evils of disease and poverty.

Encouraged by the community's recognition of responsibility for the aged, the infirm, and the victims of industrial misfortune, the architect, and the pioneer town planning found new outlets for their skill and energies. Concurrently, organisations of industry woke to the commercial value of social betterment. Leaders such as Lord Cadbury and Rowntree—prompted by mixed motives of goodwill and better business—saw their weight into the scales against counties of return to the days of industrial misfortune. Thus, within forty years we have witnessed a veritable revolution in the organisation of industrial and community life. Nevertheless, the wheel yet has to come full circle.

Great as have been the changes in the last thirty or forty years, signs of even greater changes in the early future are evident to all thoughtful observers. With that conscious prospect in view, questions of the adaptation of State Department to community services demand early and serious attention. Already the British Government, by appointing a body of experts to report on the organisation of public departments, has recognised the need for such a study. The
